The aims of the Work and Equalities Institute are to identify and promote the conditions for more inclusive and fair work and employment arrangements. The Institute conducts world-leading interdisciplinary research, focused around four key themes: business transformation and work futures, fair treatment at work, inequalities and the life course, and regulation and representation.

Justice at Work

Challenges and Possibilities

The conference aims to bring together academics and practitioners to discuss strategic issues on the subject of justice and fairness at work.

The last two years have seen a major shift in the political environment and an emergence of a politics of national insularity. Yet at the same time major strides have been made in raising awareness and support for living wage campaigns and improving workplace justice.

The conference aims to discuss developments in our understandings of the impact of technological changes (e.g. the gig economy), the changing experiences of work amongst groups of vulnerable workers (e.g. younger workers), the impact of an increasingly hostile context on notions of justice and fairness at the workplace (e.g. a greater challenge to minority rights) and the responses and roles of trade unions and other civil society organisations in dealing with such challenges.

The Work and Equalities Institute will be holding a fringe event at the TUC 150th anniversary congress on the evening of Tuesday 11th September.

Plenary speakers include:

Professor Ralph Darlington
